

Each of us can make a difference.

There are thirty human rights, as laid down by the United Nations in 1948. Together they offer a guide as to how people should behave towards one another and how states and rulers should treat their citizens. But 'should' is one thing and reality another. If human rights are to be respected, both awareness and courage are required.

One person who stood up for other people and displayed great moral courage was Raoul Wallenberg. He paid for it with his life.

The cube is part of a unique school project in Sweden. Thirty black cubes, one for each human right, are distributed to selected schools around the country. Inside the cubes, pupils show how we can stand up for human rights, inspired by the actions of Raoul Wallenberg.

Together with the Raoul Wallenberg Academy and local Swedish diplomatic missions, the Swedish Institute is now launching this school project abroad, as a means of spreading awareness about human rights.
