A Tribute to Children’s Books

Books can make us laugh and cry. They open our minds to new possibilities.

Books help us develop our language and our vocabulary.

Books set our imagination and train us in looking at new images.
Books can ask fresh questions that are meaningful and cause us to reflect further.

Books give us concepts to think with. They broaden our understanding and our world.

Books help us understand that we are both unique and universal.

Books enable us to become someone else. They develop our ability to empathize and to find compassion.
Books make us reflect on what's right or wrong, good or bad.

Books can critique reality and help us understand how things are connected.

Books can show us that most things can be seen from different points of view.

Books help us to confront issues we consider as others think and feel or do.
Books give us knowledge about nature, technology, and history, and about other communities and other ways of life.

Books offer company when we’re lonely.

Books are part of our cultural heritage. They give us shared reading experiences and common frames of reference.

Books that we read aloud bring children and adults together.
Children's books give us access to different artistic forms and collaboration, photography, poetry and drama.

Children's books represent our first encounter with literature—amazing worlds that last all our lives.
